What can you do with an international studies degree?
Government, business and nonprofits all seek international studies majors. There are also many graduate programs in international studies, and international law is a rapidly growing field within the legal profession. Recent SXU graduates are employed as intelligence analysts, translators and bankers, working in such diverse places as the Deutsche Bank, the South African consulate, the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations and the National Geospatial Intelligence Agency.

Why major in international studies at SXU?
The international studies major at Saint Xavier offers a well-rounded education, including the development of language skills, broad exposure to cultural and political approaches to international affairs, and in-depth study in a specific region of the world. Courses from a wide variety of disciplines work together to support the international studies major, including political science, history, anthropology, business, literature, religious studies and art.

International studies majors participate in the college Model United Nations. Students have opportunities to study abroad and/or intern at local and national agencies involved in international affairs. SXU partners with a wide range of study abroad programs, allowing students to earn major credit during a semester or academic year in Africa, Asia, Europe and South America. Chicago is one of the most international cities in the country and offers great opportunities to develop skills and explore interests in international affairs.
